As the reporter societies are arranging for a series of handbooks was leaving, Guiteau came after him with another containing information with regard to the princiletter. The letter containing the "new ideas" was dated at Hudson, Ill., December 26. It is signed "(By order) Emma Snavely, Elocutionist," Dr. Gray was recalled to the stand. Mr. Corkhill says: "I trust your honor will be so kind as to read and consider the following, which is a new version of Shakespeare's 'Brutus on the Death of said he had no further questions to ask. Then fol-low the old, familiar lines, declaimed at every school exhibition, "Hear me for my cause, and be proportion of homicidal cases admitted to the silent that you may hear," but so amended as to put Garfield in Cæsar's place and Guiteau in that witness' asylum. Dr. Gray was excused from the of Brutus, and to substitute "my country" for "Rome." Where Shakespeare makes Brutus say,
"As he was ambitious, I slew him," Miss Snavely's muse suggests the line, "But by Delty's inspiration I removed him." President Arthur is made to figure as Marc Antony. The letter closes by saying: "I have composed the above oration with a Mr. Scoville, opening his satchel, drew out a long ing: "I have composed the above oration with a view to render it in public, as I have been a successful public reader for several seasons, and, if you do not object, I should be pleased to add it to my program. I shall bring my too long letter to a close, and with this I send the deepest sympathy and kindest regards that my heart can conceive, and sincerely hope that Providence will as ever be your friend and adviser."

The other letter was from a patent medicine sheet of paper covered with memoranda, and consulted for a minute or two with Mr. Reed. Then he walked over to the dock, and interrupting the prisoner's occupation of writing autographs, for a short while held a brief conference with him. Returning to his seat, Mr. Scoville called Dr. Bowker Mr. Scoville remarked that he had been taken by surprise somewhat by the prosecution not calling The other letter was from a patent medicine firm in Chicago, and accompanied a box of "nerve and brain treatment." COURT MARTIAL.—Before the Whittaker case goes to the President for a final decision it will go to the Attorney General. Judge Advocate General Swaim has taken the ground that the organization of the Whittaker court martial was illegal. He holds that the President has not the authority to organize such a court without the request of the department commander within whose jurisdiction the case is. That such is the prerogative of the President of the United States in his capacity as ommander in chief of the army and navy has not been questioned in the past. In the navy, how-ever, this question was considered so doubtful that a special act granting the individual discretion to the President to order court martials was passed a It is the simplest, strongest and finest finished Machine ever produced; every movement positive, and no springs. The opinion of General Swaim that the President has not such discretion in the army under the present laws is opposed to a former decision on the subject made by his predecessor, who held that he had. The Whittaker court martial was not called for by General Schofield, who then commanded the department of West Point, but was the result of the request of the defense after the findings of the court of inquiry which was held at West Point were made known. The question of the illegality of the court martial will have to be decided by Attorney General Brewster before any further steps in the Whittaker case are taken. That question will be referred to Mr. Brewster in a few days.
